"After years of custom development and player-cooperative research, FIFA and PES are finally bringing HyperMotion Technology to life in all respects," said Christian Svensson, SVP Studio head for Evolution Studios. "We're very proud that the gameplay is the culmination of this unique collaboration between our teams, as well as over 100 professional footballers. It's been a very long time since we worked together on an all-new engine, and we can't wait for our players to put it to the test!" "Creating and implementing a new and completely new simulation engine into a game is a really ambitious project. We are thrilled to have a new engine, the research and development of the technology that will be used in the real life environments and the players, to make the simulation more realistic. We have a passion for the game and the technology we have created. We are also excited to work with our partners at EA Sports to develop the future of FIFA, bringing this to life as this technology will add so much to the simulation of football." "To create a truly authentic game world, it takes many components working in harmony, and with the Evolution Studio, the engine and engine technology are key to making that happen. To be able to develop on the player model technology that we have jointly developed with EA and be able to manage, input and input into the tools that Evolution Studio and EA have created is a real privilege."
